COUNCILMEMBER DJOU: AUDIT SHOWS THE CITY'S CREDIT CARD IS MAXED OUT

Today, the City Auditor released a report stating the City and County of Honolulu has "no comprehensive strategic plan to manage all its debt."

Councilmember Charles K. Djou (Waikiki, Hawaii Kai) reacted to the auditor's report stating, "It's clear the City has a debt and spending problem. The City has 'maxed' out all of its credit cards and it's time to realize that we are incurring debt bills we can't afford. The City Auditor's report validates my long-standing desire to establish a debt and spending ceiling for Honolulu. We simply cannot continue the practice of increasing debt without a clear plan for paying it back."

The audit revealed that Honolulu's debt service was 12.7% of the operating budget in Fiscal Year 2002, but is projected to grow to a whopping 22% of the budget by 2010.

The audit further found that other municipal governments such as Portland, Denver, Seattle and Scottsdale all have explicit debt ceilings, while Honolulu does not, and those cities have superior debt management practices. The City Council passed a debt and spending ceiling bill introduced by Councilmember Djou in 2003, but the bill did not survive a veto by former Mayor Harris. Councilmember Djou introduced similar bills last year, but his bills are currently opposed by Mayor Hannemann and have not advanced out of committee.
